Transforming Homeland Security: U.S. and European Approaches

Edited by Esther Brimmer

Defending societies and providing for homeland security make new demands on national security structures. How should countries organize their civilian and military assets to meet the challenges? What are the roles of the private sector or the place of intelligence operations? How can these security measures be crafted consistent with our ideals and political cultures?

In this book, European and American experts analyze efforts to manage civilian-military relationships in the field of homeland security on both sides of the Atlantic. Chapter authors discuss possible roles for armed forces in supporting homeland security; elicit lessons to be learned from ongoing transformation programs for homeland security; and outline possible joint action to overcome shortfalls and to improve the interplay between military and civilian capabilities commensurate with the new security risks. The book presents a joint road map for immediate and long-term policy action at national, European and transatlantic levels.

This volume results from collaboration among the Center for Transatlantic Relations at the Johns Hopkins University's Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies, the Politisch-Militärische Gesellschaft (PMG), and the Danish Institute for International Studies (DIIS).
